Joanne Kyger — 'fearless' poet blazed trails with the Beats

By John McMurtrie

Joanne Kyger, a leading poet of the San Francisco Renaissance and a rare female voice of the male-dominated Beat generation, has died.

Ms. Kyger died Wednesday at her home in Bolinas, in hospice care, said her husband, Donald Guravich. The cause of death was lung cancer, with complications from osteoarthritis and atrial fibrillation. She was 82.

"Joanne Kyger was a trailblazer, fearless and full of insight," said City Lights Publisher Elaine Katzenberger. "Her poetry has influenced generations of younger poets, and there are many in the Bay Area and beyond who will be missing her fierce humor and generous mentorship."

Ms. Kyger wrote almost 30 collections of poetry, beginning with "The Tapestry and the Web" (1965). "On Time: Poems 2005-2014," published by City Lights Publishers, showcased themes informed by her longtime practice of Zen Buddhism and her concern for the environment. Her prose collections included "Strange Big Moon: Japan and India Journals 1960-1964" (1981).

Ms. Kyger had been working on a new book, "There You Are: Interviews, Journals, and Ephemera" — the first in a new interview series by Wave Books — that will be published in September.

In addition to her writing, Ms. Kyger taught at Mills College, the New College of California and Naropa University in Boulder, Colo.

Born in Vallejo in 1934, Ms. Kyger moved to San Francisco in 1957 after attending UC Santa Barbara. In San Francisco, she joined a community of poets, living in the communal East West House, where she studied Zen Buddhism.

"Every night I would go out in North Beach," Ms. Kyger told The Chronicle in 2003, describing her excursions in heady 1950s San Francisco. "I'd go to The Place, where they had Blabbermouth Night. It was all very exciting. I had this pair of red Capozios, and I'd run up and down the street. I had to have them re-heeled every week, I was on the go so much."

It was during the Beat era that Ms. Kyger was given the nickname "Miss Kids" — because she called people "Kids," she said.

Although most poets of the postwar San Francisco Renaissance movement were men, Ms. Kyger said, "I never noticed I was in 'male-dominated' groups." In a 2015 Poetry Foundation interview, she said, "There were always women I was friends with associated with these groups. But few were interested in poetry and writing to the degree I was."

Among those in Ms. Kyger's circle were the poets Jack Spicer and Robert Duncan and the man who would be her husband, from 1960 to 1964: Gary Snyder. The couple lived in Japan and traveled throughout India with the poets (and partners) Allen Ginsberg and Peter Orlovsky. She returned to California in 1964.

"There was something blithe about her," fellow Beat poet Michael McClure said by phone. "She was deeply committed to Buddhism, and some of her poems were genuinely funny."

McClure also described Ms. Kyger as full of openness and goodwill. "She was really a California person," he said, and had an attachment to the Pacific Ocean that drew her closer to Japan and Buddhism.

In his 2002 Chronicle review of "As Ever: Selected Poems," John Freeman wrote that Ms. Kyger's best poetry, her "short, imagistic observations of daily life," drew its inspiration from her Marin County surroundings. Her work, he added, "uses a reader's breath (these poems are best read silently, then aloud) to turn poetry into a kind of prayer."

These lines from the poem "Saturday February 4" convey as much:

*White sheen on open Bolinas ridge top
Powdered white sugar
the whole long ridge is covered with light dusting of snow
this has never happened before in my memory*

Ms. Kyger stayed true to her Buddhist beliefs long after living in Japan. "When you die," she wrote in the poem "Night Palace," "you wake up from the dream."

In addition to her husband, Ms. Kyger is survived by a nephew, Robert S. Miller III.

No memorial services have been announced.

Anne Sands
Radio Interview on Original Minds
KWMR 89.9 – Sat. 4/25 9-10 AM

How much can one woman accomplish?

Here are a few highlights from Dogtown resident Anne Sands' life. She graduated in biological science and worked at the cutting edge of California's state evolving environmental science and ecology movement in the 1960s and 70s. As an environmental consultant she coordinated significant California projects, brought together state agencies and environmental organizations and sometimes had field adventures as an--like slithering down a helicopter's rope over a whitewater river to collect aquatic samples.

After years of coming to coastal Marin with her husband Russ, they moved here in 1992. Anne served as a Bolinas volunteer firewoman and EMT, then on the Bolinas fire department board from 1997-2006, including as president of the board. She was chairwoman of the successful firehouse-clinic building project, and is currently West Marin Disaster Council Coordinator. Also, as a lifetime horse woman and an endurance rider, she plans to participate in parts of an upcoming ride from Texas to Canada.

Tune in to our wonderful local radio station, KWMR, to hear an interesting conversation about Anne's background, inspirations, fascinating experiences and life spent serving our state's environment and West Marin communities. Elia Haworth Bolinas Friends and Residents please plan to attend the STATE OF THE LAGOON PRESENTATION next Thursday in Stinson Beach. Besides giving an update on the current plans for the lagoon restoration project that is in the planning stage for the Bolinas Wye it will present other research and restoration projects that are presently underway. The project at the Wye is intended to improve the Lagoon's dynamics and inter-tidal function, road flooding and highway access and safety. It is another positive step the County and Federal agencies take to keep Bolinas Lagoon dynamics in good order. The lagoon is a vital element to the town of Bolinas and as residents we should take advantage of these opportunities to see and hear what is being done to maintain the health of the Lagoon.

KWMR Film Screening

Saturday, March 25, 6:30 PM to 10:00 PM $10 or sliding scale towards KWMR's Spring Pledge Drive.

Everybody is talking about Spotify and the pros and cons of "free." Musician and first-time filmmaker Rain Perry confronts a big issue by telling a small story - of the longest continuously operating recording studio in Austin, TX and the shopkeeper who runs it, Mark Hallman. After recording Carole King, Ani DiFranco and many great Austin artists, Mark is struggling to keep the studio open in the era of streaming. Funny, sweet and insightful, with great music and interviews with Ani DiFranco, Iain Matthews, Eliza Gilkyson and more, The Shopkeeper captures the resolute spirit and frustration of musicians today. This film is presented as part of KWMR's Spring Pledge Drive. We are celebrating independent musicians. Pledge Dates: March 17-24, 2017.
