JASON FARNHAM: PIANO CONCERT SERIES

An afternoon of contemporary piano with Jason Farnham has delighted audiences around the US again and again. Fans have affectionately dubbed him "Schroeder" from Peanuts because of his toy piano, his witty Victor Borge-style piano/comedy antics, and the clever way he interacts with the audience. Music includes contemporary romantic piano, jazz, bossa nova, blues, stride piano, and classical with a modern twist! Jason is always looking for an interesting spin on the status quo, a way to take a classic and turn it on its ear, soooo... the newest addition to his piano show is "Fur Elise" with a techno-rock-dance beat: "Fur Crying Out Loud Elise, Let's Dance!" And Mozart's "Rondo Alla Turca" has now become "Rondo Alla Techno". He's also re-envisioned "Autumn Leaves" into a fusion of bossa nova and samba styles. Playing the piano while lying upside down Amadeus-style? Check. And always included in the lineup are a handful of the signature original piano pieces Jason's fans adore, like his 2008 original instrumental hit, "Lisa's Song."

Sunday, November 16, 4 PM / $22 general, $20 seniors $20, $11 teens & kids

The Weekender

I'm super excited about Saturday's Hearsay News Exhibition at the Bolinas museum!

The Hearsay News gave me a safe place to come out as a... sort-of columnist. I always love the rock-n-roll-ish zine look the editors fashion it in. And I can't wait to see the fonts, layouts, imagery, words, and styles of past Hearsay publications on paper.

I haven't written a "Weekender" piece for many weekends and haven't been to Bolinas lately either. Instead I became ensconced in my ultra-modern urban conveniences. Fast Internet. Hot baths. Restaurants. Washer/Dryer.

Before I saw the Hearsay was having an exhibition I had lazily resigned myself to another weekend in the city. Maybe I would catch a movie or organize a corner of the garage. Now, it's like... No Waaaay! Boooooring! Thank you, once again, Hearsay News for getting me back into Bolinas and engaged in something cool.

On another note. The Bolinas bus.

This bus has served me well many times. Over a many month period, during the dry warm winter of 2014, I had no automobile. So in order to spend weekends in Bolinas I had to bus it. I would ride my bike to a SF city bus stop, hop onto a Golden Gate transit bus (and struggle, every time, to load my bike into an odd compartment nested in the belly of the bus), and easily transfer in Marin City myself and my bike onto the Stagecoach 61. Last stop Bolinas.

When I arrive by bus I go straight to a bathroom and then onto the Peoples store for some warm, sweet and comforting chai tea and weekend provisions. Sit down. Chill out. Then psyche myself out for the next stage of the journey, a beautiful bike ride up and into the Big Mesa for a weekend retreat.

When Sunday comes rolling around I return to our little bus to transport me and my bike gently out of Bolinas and towards the city. It works like a charm everytime, I've always appreciated our local mini-mass public-transportation system. It's a total bummer to hear it was vandalized. -Miss Sera Mac

BOLINAS

Study: Presence of toxins lingering

Researchers tracked traces of flame retardant chemicals

By Heather Somerville
Bay Area News Group

A new study of a group of Bolinas and Richmond residents — the first of its kind — shows that a small group of people carry in their bodies traces of chemicals in flame retardants that for decades have been used in the manufacturing of furniture and children's products.

The small study, to be released Wednesday, offers the first glimpse of how these chemicals, which have been shown to cause cancer, neurological diseases and developmental disorders, have been absorbed into people's bodies simply by sitting on a couch or breathing in dust, and offers a strategy for state and local bio-monitoring programs to test larger populations, experts say.

The better people's exposure to these harmful chemicals can be tracked, advocates say, the better experts can understand how they make people sick, offering more ammunition for legislative change to regulate toxic chemicals.

The findings also underscore the possible consequences of a California law passed in 1975 that set fire safety standards that effectively required furniture manufacturers to inject flame-retardant chemicals into all upholstered furniture sold in the state for the last 40 years. The bill was revised Jan. 1 to remove the flame retardant requirement, but some experts caution that Californians will be dealing with the public health fallout for several years.

"We might have been really naive about the health effects of these chemicals," said Dr. Catherine Thomasson, executive director for Physicians for Social Responsibility.

The study, by Silent Spring Institute, an environmental nonprofit in Massachusetts, and university researchers in Belgium, found traces of a chemical that has been named a carcinogen on the state's Proposition 65 list in 15 out of 16 people from Richmond and Bolinas, who had their urine and homes tested for chemicals in 2011.

"If you have something that's listed on Proposition 65 as a carcinogen and we're finding it in Californians, that's kind of disconcerting," said Robin Dodson, a research scientist at Silent Spring and the study's lead author.

The concern, researchers say, is that the chemicals in flame retardants, which are in more than 80 percent of the furniture sold in the state, don't just stay inside the upholstered furniture — they end up in household dust, are inhaled, and can turn up in a person's urine, blood and breast milk.

"If you touch something (like a couch), then put food in your mouth, you've eaten (the chemicals)," Thomasson said. "These flame retardants stay in the fat of people. They don't leave the body very readily."

And the same chemicals have been linked to disproportionately high incidents of cancer among California firefighters, who are exposed to them when houses burn, as well as to neurological disorders, cardiovascular health effects, obesity and infertility in children and adults, according to research from UC San Francisco, North Carolina State University, physicians organizations and other academic groups.

Toddlers are at especially high risk of exposure because they are crawling on the floor, where they have more contact with dust, and put their hands in their mouth.

Silent Spring researchers worry in particular about the high rates of two chemicals they found — TCEP and TDCIPP, both on the Proposition 65 list. TDCIPP was banned from children's pajamas in the 1970s after concerns were raised about its effects on children's development, but has since become a staple in couches, carpet padding, sleeping pads and other common household goods.

"It's having this resurgence," said Connie Engel, the science and education senior manager for San Francisco health advocacy group the Breast Cancer Fund. "If we don't ban a chemical for multiple uses they have a rebirth for different uses, and that is not necessarily smart policymaking."

TDCIPP was found in 94 percent of people tested and TCEP was found in 75 percent. Researchers also tested the dust in people's homes, and found in many cases that the chemical content increased between 2006 and 2011, the two years they tested. Six homes had a level of TDCIPP that exceeded the level of safe exposure outlined by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, and four had unsafe levels of TCEP.

The North American Flame Retardant Alliance, the industry trade group, said flame retardants have an important place in furniture manufacturing.

"They have been shown to be an important element of a comprehensive fire-safety tool kit," said spokesman Bryan Goodman in a statement. "This particular study, which includes an exceptionally small sample size, does not suggest that the flame retardants mentioned caused any adverse health effects."

Although the study was small, experts deduced that a study of all Californians would show similar results. Because of the 1975 bill, Californians have had much more exposure to these chemicals than others.

A study in 2011 by the Center for Environmental Research and Children's Health showed that Mexican-American children in California had traces of flame retardant chemicals that was seven times higher than their counterparts in Mexico.

THE WOMAN BEHIND THE DAY OF THE DEAD ALTAR

And she is very much alive! Mirta Guzman has been setting up and taking care of the altars for the Day of the Dead celebrations here in Bolinas for the past 10 years. Each one is an art piece in and of itself. Mirta does this out of love and devotion to her culture and to ours.

Talking with her today, she explained how she includes elements of all the cultures represented here in Bolinas and in the larger USA - an African cloth, a Guatemalan weaving, pan de los muertos and on and on.

Mirta is a big presence here in Bolinas and if you have not had the pleasure of meeting her yet, you will. In town celebrations she is either serving for the Center or selling her own tamales or pozole somewhere in town. She is lively, generous and a big heart — especially about giving her time and effort, along with her money, to set up the Community Altar. If you missed the event on November 1 and November 2 — mark your calendars for next year and come down to remember your beloved dead and celebrate their lives with all of us.

Next year I hope to have a donation box to compensate for her loss of income and her expenditures. She explained to me today that she loses two days of work and sometimes a party at night, and the fruit, bread, candles, etc. are all paid for out of her pocket. This year the center paid for the flowers and that was a help but we can do better than that!! Next year when you come to feast both your tummy and your eyes and commemorate your dead ones, be generous with the donation box and show Mirta how much she is appreciated. Gracias.

FYI- Marin County is still counting absentee voter ballots. They update the tally weekly on Fridays until the end of November. I believe that Stinson absentee ballots have been counted, but not Bolinas so the final numbers could still change in our local election.

About 30,000 Ballots Left to Count from Election

San Rafael, CA - Nearly 61,000 ballots were counted by the Marin County Elections Office staff on Election Day, and about 30,000 vote-by-mail and provisional ballots still need to be counted to certify the election. The first results were posted at 8:08 p.m. November 4 and the count ended by 10:43 p.m., Registrar Lynda Robert said. Her staff has 28 days to finish the count and certify the final results.

"It was relatively smooth sailing throughout," Roberts said. "The team effort of everyone involved, including our team of extra hires, really makes the difference. We are like a big family, and I feel very fortunate to be working with this dedicated and professional group of people. They deserve the credit for making this a successful day."

In the most recent gubernatorial election in November 2010, participation by registered voters was 76.17 in Marin. Roberts said it is unlikely that the turnout for this election will be that high, but "it should be about 60 percent."

About 30 full-time Elections Office staff members and 585 poll station workers worked Tuesday night. Part-time employees will continue to count ballots over the next few weeks.

Bolinas Hearsay News celebrates 40th anniversary

By Elia Haworth

The history of local newspapers includes publications such as the West Marin Star in the 1930s that served Coastal Marin communities and "tributary territories." There was the Baywood newspaper, predecessor of the Point Reyes Light, one of our two outstanding contemporary newspapers; the other, born out of the community, is the West Marin Citizen. But of all local newspapers past and present, the Bolinas Hearsay News is the most unusual. Now celebrating its 40th anniversary year, the Hearsay, as it is commonly called, is a uniquely democratic community service. It was established in 1974 with the motto "Everyone is a reporter."

As the voice for local community news, anyone can contribute as long as submissions are signed and without slander or libel. Each issue may include community news, events, town meetings, want ads, prose, opinions, controversies, art, birthday and death announcements, complaints, compliments, commentary, savvy articles on world events and much more. There may be poetry from a nationally renowned local poet or from the little kid next door. The Hearsay is still published three times a week, with different individuals working regularly on a Monday, Wednesday or Friday publication, printed on legal size paper—usually as six or eight pages. The Hearsay is also now available online by subscription. This convenience is growing in popularity, particularly for subscribers who keep up with Bolinas news while living in other parts of the nation or the world. Older online archived papers are fascinating and free to browse.

Produced and supported by locals, townspeople also serve as editors and distributors, and while the staff changes over time, their dedication does not.

Bolinas Hearsay News, a name suggested by poet Lewis McAdams, was founded by Michael Rafferty. Two years after he arrived in Bolinas in 1971, Rafferty, a third generation butcher, became the town butcher at Bolinas Market. He says, while on the job he got to know every carnivore in town and vegetarians who bought cheese. Rafferty, with degrees in literature and an immense sociological curiosity, listened to people and thought there might be interest in local news. Now, after forty years, so many talented people have worked on the paper, the family of Hearsay staff past and present is huge. The contributors must count in the thousands.

To celebrate this local newspaper the Bolinas Museum is presenting an exhibit in the history room that will include the more than 50,000 pages of published Bolinas Hearsay News from the past 40 years, in bound volumes for people to peruse. Opening day of the exhibit is Saturday, November 15, 2-4 pm. There will be a community celebration with food and drink and everyone is invited!

LONG BEFORE Carson wrote Silent Spring, she worried about DDT and other synthetic pesticides that had come into wide use following World War II. The Fish and Wildlife Service had begun testing the effects of pesticides on nontargeted wildlife in the mid-1940s. Since DDT was often sprayed from airplanes, its effects across large areas were hard to assess. Species that could move away from the spray often did just that.

But as evidence from more controlled experiments accumulated, it became clear that DDT was toxic to every species tested. This included birds. They could easily escape the spraying but in the end proved to be among the most vulnerable, since they couldn't avoid eating prey that had become contaminated.

"She thought the sound of a large flock of geese flying overhead was among the most thrilling things in nature."

This was discovered in the late 1950s, when researchers at Michigan State University realized that American Robins on campus were being killed by DDT-spraying operations aimed at combatting Dutch elm disease. It turned out that while DDT killed some robins directly, others succumbed after entering treated areas long after the spraying. The birds consumed earthworms that had eaten leaf litter contaminated during spraying sessions the previous year. Even more dramatically, it would eventually be found that Bald Eagles that consumed DDT-tainted fish suffered reproductive failure — and on such a widespread scale as to threaten the bird with extinction.

The threat posed to birds by DDT and other pesticides was a central theme of Silent Spring. In fact, it was the bird problem that gave the book its name and that Carson featured so disturbingly in its opening chapter, one of the great set pieces in American literature — a fable in which a vibrant American town begins to die after a "strange blight" falls from the sky. Wildlife, livestock, and people all sicken from the ubiquitous poison, as the town falls silent:

There was a strange stillness. The birds, for example — where had they gone? Many people spoke of them, puzzled and disturbed. The feeding stations in the backyards were deserted. The few birds seen anywhere were moribund; they trembled violently and could not fly. It was a spring without voices. On the mornings that had once throbbed with the dawn chorus of robins, catbirds, doves, jays, wrens, and scores of other bird voices there was now no sound; only silence lay over the fields and woods and marsh.

Rachel Carson discovered she had breast cancer while she was writing Silent Spring, and she died of her cancer at her home in Silver Spring, Maryland, in the spring of 1964, two years after alerting the world to the danger pesticides posed to wildlife and potentially to human health. She was 56.

She endured harsh criticism from the pesticide industry even before the book appeared but was unbowed. "I have felt bound by a solemn obligation," she wrote a friend, "to do what I could — if I didn't at least try I could never be happy again in nature."

On the day she died, her longtime friend Dorothy Freeman confided that she took solace in knowing that every morning, when Carson woke up, the birds were singing outside her window. ⑥

William Souder is the author of On a Farther Shore: The Life and Legacy of Rachel Carson, published in September 2012. He has written for the Washington Post, New York Times, Harper's, and Slate. His previous book, Under a Wild Sky, a biography of John James Audubon, was a finalist for the Pulitzer Prize.
