CONSCIOUS INSPIRATION
BEING CREATIVE EVERY DAY

Many people harbor the idea that there are two kinds of people in the world: creative and noncreative. You often hear certain individuals saying, "I wish I were creative."

Actually, we are all inherently creative. As human beings, creativity is our birthright. We use it to get through each and every day in simple tasks such as picking out what to wear or choosing the words we use to express ourselves. Not only is it natural for us to be creative, it is also healthy. Experts say that conscious creativity is as good for our overall sense of well-being as exercising, eating right, and getting enough sleep.

When we are "in the zone" with our creativity, we move into a different experience of time and space; hours pass like minutes, and we sometimes literally forget where we are. Our logical mind, which generally runs the show, takes a backseat to imagination and intuition, creating a feeling of spaciousness, calm, and release. When we return to the grid of everyday reality, we see with new eyes.

You can easily access your creativity throughout the day with simple exercises. At work, take a moment to rearrange the items on your desk or wall, maybe replacing old photographs or objects with new images that inspire new thoughts. Just five minutes devoted to this simple creative act can noticeably refresh your mind. To elevate your entire day into a more creative zone, take your camera with you and document one full day in your life.

The benefits of creativity are in the doing. The finished product, while wonderful, is almost beside the point. What matters most is the experience of being awake and relaxed in the flow of our lives.

Far West Fest

Love Field is mowed, the posters and signs are out in the communities. The 8th Annual Far West Fest this Saturday, July 27 in Point Reyes Station. What started eight years ago as a KWMR summer fundraising event has grown into a community tradition and a major fundraiser for West Marin non-profits made possible by Home Base, KWMR and independent producer Jim Pettigrew.

The recipe that includes the Inverness ridge to the west with a wisp of fog receding in the morning and the blue skies above, kids running around on the green grass with their families enjoying the music, food, vendors and good company is my top memory of Far West Fest each year.

We hope to see your smiling face out at Love Field in Point Reyes Station this Saturday and enjoy a part of most of the day sampling music from the three stages, tasty local cuisine from the food vendors, get your face painted in the kids' zone and pick up a stylish Far West Fest T-shirt. The proceeds from this event help to fund KWMR, Home Base at Love Field and area youth organizations.

— Amanda Eichstaedt

Fortune Wheel at Far West Fest

Come spin you fortune at the Far West Fest this Saturday. I'll be out on the second base line with the Wheel of Life. After the festival last year I was so inspired a song came to me:

West Marin Alive

You and I were on Love Field, peace and love and the fortune wheel.

*You and I were at our best,

*Soaking in the sounds
and soaking in the vibe.*

Soaking in the love of West Marin alive.

*We do this for our radio,
we support the folks we know.*

*We do this for community,
that's means us - you and me.*

At 11am I'll be singing "West Marin Alive" plus "KWMR" on the acoustic stage. Hope to see you there.

bringing order to your financial world

Grigory Potemkin was a dashing 18th century Russian nobleman who intrigued in courts, smote his enemies upon the steppes and allegedly wooed Catherine the Great

It was while he was courting his nation's comely Tsarina — at least according to legend — that his name came to forever stand for something insubstantial. For Catherine's 1783 tour of new Russian possessions in the Crimea, Potemkin endeavored to show her the best face of the empire. As the story goes, pasteboard facades of pretty towns were set up at a distance on riverbanks.

At stops, she'd be greeted by regiments of Amazonian snipers or fields set ablaze by burning braziers and exploding rockets spelling her initials; whole populations of serfs were moved around and dressed up in fanciful garb to flaunt a prosperity that didn't exist (later precipitating famine in the region).

Recent historical work has proved the tale in part apocryphal, but the legend stuck. A "Potemkin village" signifies any deceptive or false construct, conjured often by cruel regimes, to deceive both those within the land and those peering in from outside.

Submitted by Steve Heilig from a discussion about the art and artifice of Bolinas with StuArt, Vic Amoroso and Neil Mendel on a sunny afternoon in the Plaza.

Usually when I write for the Hearsay it's on the subject of the wonders of nature, but the only thought I have on that at the moment is that potatoes are hard, round and usually brown, so perhaps we'd better leave the woodland walks for another time. Instead I'd like to discuss how much I enjoy reading articles in the hearsay, and how many more of them I'd like to see.

The problem with an open forum for communication is that few have anything to say to people they'll never speak to, and the exceptions have little reason to say it intelligently. The Hearsay addresses the latter issue by disallowing anonymous submissions. Anyone familiar with the frothing lunacy of the internet's comment sections will accept this in stride, but it does make finding content something of a challenge. Aside from a few stalwart literary warriors that hold the white space at bay, few people seem to have opinions on books, public events, movies, music, etc. In order to increase authorship, I propose a thought experiment: let's pretend, for a moment, that the Hearsay is bombarding you with guilt as effectively as NPR would. Imagine Ira Glass abusing slow witted non-contributors, and telling you plainly not to be like them. Imagine weeks of being told that your contribution is an expected part of civic life, like jury duty. Don't you feel like writing something just to relieve the burden of your misbehavior?

It needn't be anything sophisticated. For example, I might write "last night, I saw Ghost Dog: Way of the Samurai. The synopsis promised me the story of a thug who rises above the gang wars of his ghetto through the ethos of the Samurai, and the movie delivered on every ounce of possibility this premise possessed. Seeing a respected actor like Forest Whitaker holster his gun with a chest high twirl-and-insert motion intended to mimic a sword being lined up for sheathing shows that the potential of filmmakers to generate new ideas is limitless. I certainly never would have thought of that." It doesn't matter. Hearing other people's thoughts is intensely interesting, so go ahead and put them down on paper so the rest of us can get some use out of them. I hope the Hearsay will be like a rock face and this tiny pebble of an opinion skittering down it will start an avalanche. Viva la revolution! Write for your damned paper!

Eric Karpeles, Jozef Czapski and Michael Lerner at Commonweal on Sunday, July 14. Speaking about Czapski's art, Eric described Czapski's drawings of people as "characature, almost cartoon." That same description could be applied to my drawing. — StuArt

Joseph Czapski

(July 14) by StuArt

On Sunday Eric Karpeles gave a fascinating talk about Polish Artist Jozef Czapski (pronounced "Chapskee") at Commonweal's New School. Eric just returned from Poland and France where he researched Czapski's life.

I'm not going to go into detail about the wealth of information that Eric gave us. (You can hear the entire talk as a podcast on iTunes.) But I would like to mention a few things that struck and stuck with me.

Joseph Czapski spent most of WW II interned in a Soviet prison camp. Eric said that his father also spent two years as a prisoner of war, a period that his father never talked about. The similarity of wartime experience sparked Eric's interest in Czapski.

Czapski's life was interwoven with the tragic subjugation of Poland during the 20th Century, first by the Nazis and Stalin, and then by the Communists. After the war when Czapski found asylum in France he was black-listed by the leftist government.

Throughout all the turmoil Czapski kept making art and keeping meticulous journals about his life. Despite man's inhumanity to man he never lost his faith and integrity.

After his presentation and a conversation with Michael Lerner, Eric asked for questions from the audience. For me Eric's description had raised a philosophical point that I've pondered for quite a while, and I was unsure if it would be considered relevant. So I waited until the end of the question and answer session, until he asked for one last question and there was a pause.

I raised my hand and asked Eric, "Do you see any connection between suffering and creativity?" There was some laughter from the audience and I began to admonish myself, but Eric took my question seriously. He made reference to labor pain and other travails of the human condition.

"Common language" is what I heard. Life is about suffering (and joy) and by expressing that suffering artistically, we communicate our commonality.

That was Czapski's and Eric's answer to me. I understood the artistic, creative spirit a bit more.

In essence the communion of communication was revealed to me at Commonweal. Thank you.
