A Labor Day celebrant kicks back during the holiday festivities in Bolinas on Monday. (Frankie Frost/Special to the Marin Independent Journal)

Oh Stop It

For a town that earned its legend for the persistent removal of highway signs directing you to it, Bolinas had a pretty funny sign situation going on recently. A couple of weeks ago, someone installed a stop sign at the corner of Wharf and Brighton streets downtown, and even painted a white stripe in the street to make it look really official. People dutifully stopped, or at least they slowed down with a quizzical moue at the sudden development. The local Nextdoor site had a couple of postings to the effect of, "What the heck is going on here?"

Well, here's what: The someone who planted the stop sign was neither the state nor the county. It was a totally outlaw sign that has confused the heck out of everyone. Where did it come from? Who is the clever wastrel who set out to slow everyone down?

The sign made for some interesting and amusing symbolism on a recent Sunday afternoon, as a line of surfboard-topped traffic stacked up at the outlaw stop sign and were greeted by a Marin County sheriff's deputy.

As the weekend parking situation in town reached its typically critical mass of rage-inducement among locals in need of a stick of butter, the deputy broke out a can of black spray-paint and sprayed over the white stripe in the road. It may be the first time in the recorded history of law enforcement that cops were encouraging people to blow a stop sign.

Beto in Bobo

Speaking of signs of the times, Texas candidate for Senate and current U.S. Rep. Beto O'Rourke is quite popular in West Marin. So popular, in fact, that there's a trio of hand-painted signs in town denoting his race against Ted Cruz. At last glance, O'Rourke was running just one point behind the repellaht Republican incumbent. Beto has refused to accept PAC money and is running a Bernie-style campaign with contributions from We the People only. Cruz has lately leaned on Sen. Mitch McConnell's PAC to pad his campaign war-chest.

Fellow representative Jared Huffman, who has had O'Rourke in his district before, is not surprised at Beto's support in Bolinas.

"I think Beto mania is real," he says, pointing to his fresh, down-to-earth approach and Cruz's profound unlikability.

O'Rourke made the internet rounds last week when he offered a very respectful and honest defense of pro sports players who chose to kneel for the national anthem. He's scheduled to be live-on-the-phone in the region on Sept. 16 for a phone-driven fundraiser.—Tom Gogola

Beneath the Fog, West Marin's Dining Scene Is Vibrant and Alluring

by Rachel Levin... Aug 15, 2018,

People come to Point Reyes National Seashore to stroll along Limantour Beach and kayak in Tomales Bay, to gawk at the herons and the herds of Tule elk. But this rural peninsula is as much a place to hike among the cows as it is to, well, eat them.

West Marin contains one of the richest local foodsheds in the country — home to ranchers and dairy farmers, oyster farmers and vegetable growers and fishermen, at least one cult winemaker, and even a couple small herds of water buffalo, prized for their milk. No wonder Alice Waters once told me it's where she "wishes Chez Panisse could be."

Eleven Bolinas 11 Wharf Road

Last August, sisters Kate and Rebecca Sterlin reopened the long-shuttered Blue Heron at 11 Wharf Road, renamed it Eleven, and brought Bolinas its first wine bar — and second restaurant.

Bolinas has long been touted as a "hidden" hippie surf village. But now Google maps demystifies the unmarked road into town and the surfers and artists and aging rock stars are joined by tech-millionaire third-home owners.

Before Eleven came along, the main drag had just one beloved place to sit down and eat, called Coast Café, and one salty dive bar to stand around and drink: Smiley's. The saloon has been over-serving locals since 1851, through the 1906 earthquake, Prohibition, everything. In 2015, it changed to new owners, Leila Monroe and Ashley Huck. They haven't changed much about Smiley's — other than maybe to add a few more types of beer on tap — but that's okay: Smiley's regulars, like most Bolinas locals, aren't big on change.

Eleven, though, is shaking things up. On a recent Monday eve, the first thing I see when I enter, toting my two kids, is a photograph of two ginormous naked breasts on a book cover, perched high on a shelf. Below it is a chalkboard scrawled with the simple truth: "Women Are Life." And strewn atop the host stand is a colorful assortment of postcards, each printed with a fitting command for a restaurant with two inn rooms upstairs: "Eat." "Drink." "F__CK." My 6-year-old son, who can't read, picks up the "F__CK" one and asks: "Can I keep this?"

Turns out, Monday night is taco night at Eleven. Its website doesn't say so, but clearly everyone here knows. The 1890s farmhouse, renovated by the Sterlins' brother, Matt, is packed. In part because most West Marin restaurants are closed on Mondays, but also because of the corn tortillas, which are thick, chewy, and handmade.

El Salvadoran line cook Karina Borjas patted them out for staff meal one afternoon, and they were such hit, now seemingly everyone in town enjoys three for $20, topped with shreds of tender carnitas, crumbles of cotija, and a tad-too-liberal splatter of crema.

Owner of Point Reyes hardware store quits selling glyphosate products

By Teresa Mathew

Point Reyes Station's Building Supply Center will no longer carry products containing the chemical glyphosate, an herbicide and ingredient in the weed-killer Roundup. Ken Dunaj, who owns the hardware store, said some customers had been asking for the discontinuation for years, but that until recently overall demand for glyphosate products had remained strong. The store's new policy comes on the heels of a lawsuit in which the agrochemical company Monsanto was ordered to pay $289 million in damages to a school groundskeeper who said the company never warned him of Roundup's potential cancer risks and who is now suffering from non-Hodgkin's lymphoma. Since the case was decided last month, the number of lawsuits in the United States regarding Roundup has risen to 8,000. Mr. Dunaj, a former chief operating officer of Restoration Hardware who bought the small store in 2015, said his decision had nothing to do with the Monsanto lawsuit, but instead with an article he read about traces of glyphosate being found in Cheerios. That, he said, was the final straw. Still, a decline in glyphosate sales was also a significant factor. "Though [the discontinuation] will inconvenience some, overall there isn't high demand," he said. "Then the recent thing that I read triggered an emotional reaction, because of children, and I decided I'm going to go ahead and pull it off the shelves." (Mr. Dunaj has a son in fifth grade at West Marin School and coaches soccer and basketball.) In 2015, after the World Health Organization ranked Taco night might morph into Haitian night this fall, say the sisters, whose father was Haitian. Local fish cooked in a coconut broth with scotch bonnet peppers and a little lime sounds nice. In winter, maybe they'll do British night, in honor of their mom. Perhaps shepherd's pie and a cuppa Berkeley's Leaves and Flower tea, they say.

Otherwise, Eleven is all about Neapolitan-style pizza, on-trend natural wines, and the off-menu purpose of bringing the community together. That community happens to include the low-key and legendary Frances McDormand, who lives nearby with her husband, Joel Cohen. They stroll by our table at Eleven one night to say "hi" to another. She's in yellow clogs, chomping a pizza crust, and I swoon.

Even without the wood-fired ovens we spoiled Bay Area types have gotten used to, the pizza, cooked in a double-decker propane oven, is decent: a blissful blend of Italy (00 flour, high brix tomatoes) and Bolinas (herbs and vegetables ripped from its own soil). The crust is golden and cracker-thin. The cheeseless pizza with anchovy and capers veers too close to cardboard, but the other pies I tried were sweet and chewy, adorned with mozzarella from Berkeley's Belfiore, or Calabrian chile and curls of zucchini from Paradise Valley.

Every meal here should begin with ice-cold oysters from Hog Island and end with an order of the lush fior di latte gelato made with water buffalo milk from Andrew Zlot's Double 8 Dairy in Petaluma. Soft-serve style and layered with smashed local strawberries, it tastes like a rare fog-free, real-summer day. In between, there are plump, parsley-crowned meatballs molded from neighbor Bill Niman's beef, which I devour, and fresh, simple, just-ripped-from-the-ground salads, which I wouldn't miss.

Beloved local farms, like Paradise and Star Route, supply the greens. And if the sisters run out of lettuce, no worries. This is Bolinas — one of them just dashes over to Gospel Flat's roadside honor bar and grabs a few bundles.

- Steve Heilig

glyphosate as a probable carcinogen, West Marin residents concerned about potential health impacts contested the use of glyphosate on county lands for killing non-native grasses. Marin parks officials subsequently halted the chemical's use, and two years ago the parks department received over $190,000 for a campaign to raise awareness of the impacts and alternatives to pesticide use on residential properties. In 2016, the county managed nearly 86 percent of its sites without pesticides, including glyphosate, but the chemical is licensed for federal use and is applied locally to control the spread of invasive grasses in the Point Reyes National Seashore "as a last resort," said park spokesman John Dell'Osso.
